Tax Credit Spotlight

This month's spotlight is the historic First National Bank of Camden building, a three-story masonry structure built around 1904 and modified with Beaux Arts designs by prominent Columbia architect George E. Lafaye around 1919. In 2020, the current owners used federal and state income-producing tax credits coupled with a private investment to rehabilitate the structure as a wine bar on the ground level and apartments on the second and third floors. The project restored the façade's windows and railings; hand-chiseled the removal of deteriorated mortar and repointed the masonry with a compatible mortar; reconstructed the ground floor façade entrance according to historic photographs; patched and repaired plaster; repaired interior stairs; repaired the historic interior wood flooring; introduced minimal changes to the floor plans while preserving the historic character of the property; added insulation between the floors and ceilings; and upgraded the mechanical, electrical, and plumbing utilities in a sensitive manner. Property owners Westley and Laurie Parks witnessed the effect of the tax incentives on historic rehabilitation: "Our architect introduced us to Chris Rogers, our attorney, and he explained the process and how we could make the project cash flow using tax credits... Although time consuming and a requirement for detailed records, we were able to finish the project during the COVID-19 pandemic and apply more than $2m in tax credits which created roughly $1.1m in cash. Otherwise this project would have been impossible." For more information on income-producing historic rehabilitation tax credits, please visit this link.
